The second step is to evaluate whether the degree of proof required complies with the four-part test of Article 46(2). The drafters of the Convention have clearly stated that an objection must be made with a full explanation of the facts and that the objector must clearly demonstrate that the arbitration agreement is not valid. The drafters did not decide what degree of proof must be applied. There are three categories of persons who are parties to an agreement. a. Initial parties; b. Additional parties; and c. Additional or continuing parties. Initial parties are parties of the first degree. Additional parties are parties of the second degree. Additional or continuing parties are parties of the third degree. Under the Convention, in order to be a party of the first degree, it must be clear that the party was a party to the contract before it became a party to the contract. If the objector has no evidence of the first degree, he may not be a party to the contract. It is important to note that the requirements of the Convention are much more stringent than the requirements of American law. The Convention is an international treaty that applies
